(K) enkephalin in phospholipid bilayers. Tetrapeptide (K) enkephalin was evaluated as an 'environment-sensitive' probe for the lipid-water interface. Its fluorescence properties were examined in different lipid systems including (diacyl-phosphatidyl)choline (PC), (diacyl-phosphatidyl)glycerol (PG), 1-palmitoyl-2-oleoyl-sn-glycero-3-phosphoserine (POPS), 2-palmitoyl-2-oleoyl-sn-glycero-3-phosphoserine

(POPS) and cholesterol (Chol). On the basis of the fluorescence measurements, the lipid binding sites of enkephalin were identified by a competitive displacement reaction. K was observed to bind preferentially at phosphatidylcholine bilayers, while PG showed preferential binding at the phosphatidylglycerol bilayer. The hydrophobic and electrostatic interactions between enkephalin and the lipids appear to be very important for its conformation and accessibility of the C-terminus. Comparison of the data with the data for opiate peptides indicated that enkephalin has similar binding sites on the phospholipid bilayers.

insights are considered as crucial for understanding its pathophysiology and for developing new treatment options. Changes in brain structure or function have been observed across the different steps of neurodevelopment. Evidence of disturbed brain functions of primary, secondary and tertiary neurotransmitter systems, axon myelination, synaptogenesis, synapse function or plasticity, as well as selective changes in volume of brain regions were reported and may have specific relevance for the pathophysiology of autism spectrum disorders. For most of these changes, the underlying molecular mechanisms and their biological relevance have
