I am developing an application that would allow users to manipulate data. The application would be embed inside a browser and thus be accessible across the Internet. Using security principals, the application would be able to request data only from the users that belongs to that principal. Unfortunately, users may not always follow the instructions to register their principal with the system, and I don't have the luxury to allow users to go to a page where they could edit their security information. The only way I can think of would be to ask the users to register with a local application that would create a security principal for them and add them to the current principal when it is created. The problem here is that I can't control when the user would register and create the principal, so I'm looking for a way to check if a user is already registered and existing principal has not been created in the meantime. Then, if the new principal can be created, add it to the current one and then proceed. The question is, what would be the best way to programmatically add a user to a different principal, is there a standard? I've found no information on the Internet regarding this. A: In general, there is no reason why you cannot add the new user principal to the current one, unless you specifically do not want the new user principal be a member of the current principal's group. The key part of the code you need to execute would be something like this (I am not adding error handling just for the sake of simplicity):

PrincipalContext
newUser = new PrincipalContext(ContextType.Domain, "domain.local", "user@domain.local", ContextOptions.SimpleBind, "user@domain.local"); UserPrincipal newUserPrincipal = new range in size classes. Body weight at 1-day, 1-week, 1-month, 2-month, 6-month, and 1-year of age, as well as maximum eggshell weight, at 1-week of age for a total of 126 commercial Cornish cross geese was measured. Eggshell production, type of food, water, and ventilation, and lighting scheme were recorded.

Generalized additive models (GAM) were used to relate body weights and weights of eggshells with potential explanatory variables. A curvilinear effect was observed between weight (at any age) and crown rump length (CRL). The optimum model describing the development of weight, maximum eggshell weight, and eggshell weight at 1-week of age included three explanatory variables. CRL was included into the model; increasing CRL led to an earlier increase in weight. An interactive effect between CRL and survival (lack of) of birds was included, indicating that early and high mortality of slow-growing birds leads to lower maximum weights of eggshells. The second principal component of a principal component analysis describing the feeding behavior of geese was included in the model as a covariate; heavier birds showed a higher component. Other explanatory variables were floor height, floor area, the distance between the floor and the wall, the number of openings in the wall, and the number of entry holes in the floor. Indicator variables for rooms, floor type, and floor height and area were also included in the model. The final model explaining eggshell weight at 1-week of age included the same three explanatory variables as the optimum model for weight. The same three explanatory variables as in the optimum model explained the development of maximum eggshell weight. For growth and eggshell weights at later ages, the models also included floor height. For these, the optimum model contained the same explanatory variables as in the models for weight and maximum eggshell weight. For body weight at one day of age, no informative explanatory variables were found. I would need to get my friends on here to read it then see if it will help them.
