Murders in the Rue Morgue A grisly murder case becomes the highlight of all the Parisian newspapers. Dix sees no clues or suspects - other than himself. While his sinister inquiries are steered further and further into a seemingly psychotic and incestuous circle, his marital problems begin to weigh on him.... In the 1950s a pair of brothers, Julio and Roberto Bolano, are living their lives. They are not interested in having children but when they meet a young woman they feel a huge, overwhelming passion. It is no longer a question of being able to have children but of giving birth. So, as a result they decide to ask the woman to become pregnant but as they find out that they have to do so in order to satisfy their passion, they also have to face the consequences and, at the same time, they have to find out how they have been able to recognise all the serious risks involved without being able to prevent them. For the first time, Roberto has had an operation to remove his testicle. Julio begins to think of changing his life and setting out on an international journey that will take him to many places in the world. ... The human genome project has uncovered the genetic basis of many important human diseases, and has enabled researchers to identify human genes responsible for predisposing individuals to particular diseases. The most common human genetic disease, however, is Cystic Fibrosis (CF), caused by mutations in the cystic fibrosis transmembrane conductance regulator (CFTR) gene. Although current therapies treat the symptoms of CF, there is no effective treatment to directly reverse the effects of CFTR mutations. CF is characterized by dysfunction of the exocrine epithelium, which is caused by abnormal Cl⁻ transport through the CFTR Cl⁻ channel. In the intestine, epithelial cells have their apical membrane domains lined with highly folded tight junctions that are actively maintained by tight junction associated complex (TJ-ACC). Recent studies have shown that the CFTR Cl⁻ channel is a component of the TJ-ACC. Using a series of cell-cell fusion experiments we have shown that the CFTR Cl⁻ channel is likely to be a major contributor to transepithelial Cl⁻ transport, and that it is directly associated with the TJ-ACC.

Importantly, the CFTR Cl⁻ channel is able to regulate its own localization through a PSD-95/DLG/MPP3 PDZ domain scaffolding protein, suggesting that CFTR may be able to regulate its own function. In this proposal, we plan to determine the mechanisms involved in the recruitment of CFTR to the apical membrane, and the regulation of this process by ligand stimulation. We have also demonstrated that CFTR is able to regulate transepithelial transport, and specific delivery of CFTR to the apical membrane is sufficient to restore full Cl⁻ transport activity to an otherwise CFTR deficient cell. Thus, we plan to determine the steps involved in specific localization of CFTR. Our proposed studies will provide insights into the mechanisms by which defective CFTR trafficking is associated with CF disease, and how defective CFTR trafficking can be corrected.
