Cognitive functioning of older physicians. Although some studies suggest that the early losses of cognitive function may increase with age, others have not. We studied the performance of 43 physicians and 53 control subjects on 18 different cognitive tasks, and also examined factors that could affect performance. Compared with controls, the physicians had lower mean scores on the Symbol Digit Modalities Test ($P = .001$) and delayed recall ($P = .01$) as well as lower scores on the second trial of digit-symbol substitution ($P = .04$). Four factors were associated with performance on the digit-symbol substitution task: sex ($P = .04$), years since medical school graduation ($P = .01$), age ($P = .001$), and age at which full time medical practice was begun

Not in JapanQ: What should be the correct way to normalize the CUW, while making sure that they never collide? I read that the CUW can be normalised to the range of $[0, \sim 1]$, which allows the smooth transition between the low confidence region and the high confidence one. I can understand the idea behind this, but in practice what could be the correct normalization to use? For example, if some CUW has already been normalized, the normalization changes will be very small, so the number of points that can be visited in the smooth transition will be very low, and so will the degree of smoothness. I understand that the solution will depend on the details of the implementation of CUW, but an example of a CUW and the normalization method would be very useful. In particular, I am dealing with a CUW of a simple galaxy, which has previously been normalized to the range of $[0, \sim 1]$. I would like to know the theory of CUW, and hence how to normalize it.
