Security -Â .Q: Prevent HTML to do backend process I had a problem when trying to use POST method in GET request. I thought that, if I have a div with submit button and want to use GET method, then submit button is the real problem and can't be simply fixed by adding input type="image" tag to the submit button. Then i found there is something wrong in my browser. I checked Chrome's console, and there are almost no errors (as I did not know what are errors in my case). Only thing that I found is an HTML document that tried to do a POST method and send data to the server that it should not. But why such a document in the first place? It's a good question. My question is: why HTML is an outdated "sub-program" and how to improve it? Is this specific to my problem? Thank you. A: It's a good question. No, it's not good question! It can't be an outdated sub-program! Let's try to understand why. It's bad question! It's a bad question because it assumes something about hunt for the best king cakes in San Francisco this past weekend. The ones I found were delicious, but not one of them measured up to the deep, rich, saffron notes of the famous New Orleans cakes. So I rounded up a few folks to come to the Chelsea Market with me to find out if anyone in the city knew which secret bakery makes a better king cake. The winner, a couple from Oakland, proved to be a tough one, so the official verdict is that no one seems to know. They did, however, all come to the conclusion that while
