And once you figure it out there is no point in running experiments.I recently read from a VC that focus groups are becoming obsolete in our high-tech world. He was probably wrong, but my question is why? We are very limited in what we can do with data when it comes to marketing, product and sales. We have a tool, but no way of getting feedback outside of what the market tells us through our service. If you can't tell me what your customers want, how can you tell how they will react to changes in product that will affect the usability and usability changes? It's just plain impossible to get a picture of what people want in the real world.Can someone explain why focus groups are obsolete in our modern world? ===== ScottWhigham Questions like this have been asked on here quite a bit in the past. I believe that the answer is always the same: it is premature to say when something is obsolete. Maybe in 10-15 years it will be obsolete. Maybe in 20 years it will be obsolete. If I did my research today, I would be saying the same thing as the VC. I have a friend who was working on a web development project and he said to me, "Scott I'm here to make SaaS obsolete". And I thought, "Well, you're half-way there" ----- BobbyH Can't you just ask your customers which features they are interested in? From then on you can bring those features to completion. ~~~ revorad [
