The children narrowly defeated the closest competitors from the East, Southwest, and Western regions to win the national title. This week, the Hillson family was the last to leave the National Geographic Bee's semifinal stage, winning the most events to advance. Hillson scored 865 points, three more than his next closest competitor, earning him a gold medal and a $20,000 college scholarship. The study of the Earth's environment has been a hallmark of Hillson's life since childhood. He showed an early aptitude for problem solving, gaining an understanding of math that far exceeds his grade level. He has a deep interest in science and biology and wants to become a professional deep-sea diver when he grows up. But the National Geographic Bee is a competition between students, not scientists. That's the way it is every year, but this year, still, it was Hillson's ability to apply his knowledge to the actual events of the day that won him the title. The reader should not pick up on the similarities between these children. You don't know what they know, how they've learned their various skills, how the way they say, or even see things is uniquely theirs. But you're supposed to. This is a national competition, a field trial for future entrepreneurs and scientists. This is where we discover the future greats of our nation. Here, the aspiring Donald
